"Francis, you will never be a danger to me. In time, I will forget you."

The voice was a woman's. She said it softly, almost as if she were speaking to herself. Francis looked up from his place on the floor. His eyes met hers, and he smiled weakly.

"You're right, Mother. I'll never be a danger to you."

He stood up, and they both turned to face the wall. The sun was setting, casting long shadows across the room. Francis knew that he had no future. He knew that he was a burden to his family. But he was content. After all, he had a mother who loved him, and that was all that mattered.

Life is but a dream, and when we wake, it will be too late to change anything.
