FEBRUARY
The Republican

FEBRUARY 17, 1862

Mr. Everett, who had no objection to the proposition of the President, said in reply that, as far as he was acquainted with the course of events, the Government had consistently evinced a desire to maintain peace with the States. In his opinion, the course of events had shown that the Northern States were determined to maintain peace with the States, and that the Union was strong enough to resist any attack. If the Northern States were determined to maintain peace, the Southern States would be unable to resist their determination.

In his opinion, the course of events had shown that the Northern States were determined to maintain peace with the States, and that the Union was strong enough to resist any attack. If the Northern States were determined to maintain peace, the Southern States would be unable to resist their determination.

Mr. Everett, who had no objection to the proposition of the President, said in reply that, as far as he was acquainted with the course of events, the Government had consistently evinced a desire to maintain peace with the States. In his opinion, the course of events had shown that the Northern States were determined to maintain peace with the States, and that the Union was strong enough to resist any attack. If the Northern States were determined to maintain peace, the Southern States would be unable to resist their determination.

In his opinion, the course of events had shown that the Northern States were determined to maintain peace with the States, and that the Union was strong enough to resist any attack. If the Northern States were determined to maintain peace, the Southern States would be unable to resist their determination.

Mr. Everett, who had no objection to the proposition of the President, said in reply that, as far as he was acquainted with the course of events, the Government had consistently evinced a desire to maintain peace with the States. In his opinion, the course of events had shown that the Northern States were determined to maintain peace with the States, and that the Union was strong enough to resist any attack. If the Northern States were determined to maintain peace, the Southern States would be unable to resist their determination.

In his opinion, the course of events had shown that the Northern States were determined to maintain peace with the States, and that the Union was strong enough to resist any attack. If the Northern States were determined to maintain peace, the Southern States would be unable to resist their determination.

Mr. Everett, who had no objection to the proposition of the President, said in reply that, as far as he was acquainted with the course of events, the Government had consistently evinced a desire to maintain peace with the States. In his opinion, the course of events had shown that the Northern States were determined to maintain peace with the States, and that the Union was strong enough to resist any attack. If the Northern States were determined to maintain peace, the Southern States would be unable to resist their determination.

In his opinion, the course of events had shown that the Northern States were determined to maintain peace with the States, and that the Union was strong enough to resist any attack. If the Northern States were determined to maintain peace, the Southern States would be unable to resist their determination.

Mr. Everett, who had no objection to the proposition of the President, said in reply that, as far as he was acquainted with the course of events, the Government had consistently evinced a desire to maintain peace with the States. In his opinion, the course of events had shown that the Northern States were determined to maintain peace with the States, and that the Union was strong enough to resist any attack. If the Northern States were determined to maintain peace, the Southern States would be unable to resist their determination.

In his opinion, the course of events had shown that the Northern States were determined to maintain peace with the States, and that the Union was strong enough to resist any attack. If the Northern States were determined to maintain peace, the Southern States would be unable to resist their determination.