JANUARY
The War in the Crimea

By Capt. James Blair, R.M.Z.

We are now in a position to give a more extended account of the state of affairs on the Crimean Peninsula. The first intimation we received of the progress of the war was the receipt of a despatch from Captain Blair, R.M.Z., which was published in the Daily News of the 15th instant. In that despatch, Captain Blair states that he had arrived at the head of a column of men and supplies, and that he was in a position to give a more extended account of the state of affairs on the Crimean Peninsula. He states that the enemy had been driven back from the town of Sebastopol, and that the position of the British forces was now secure. He also states that the British fleet was in a position to give aid to the land forces, and that he hoped to be able to capture Sebastopol in the near future.

The British fleet was composed of several large warships and a number of smaller vessels, all of which were well armed and in excellent condition. The British army was also well equipped, and consisted of several thousand men, who were well trained and disciplined. The British forces were in a position to give aid to the land forces, and to capture Sebastopol in the near future.

The war in the Crimea is now in full swing, and the British forces are making steady progress. The enemy is driven back, and the position of the British forces is now secure.
