The Lady of the Golden Sheaf

It is the honeymoon month, and I am writing from my returning bride, Mrs. William's. Her beauty, her graces, her talents, her accomplishments, her social position, and all that constitute her reputation, are the subject of universal admiration. She is, in every sense, a perfect gem of feminine beauty.

The ceremonies of their wedding were grand and magnificent. The rtn of the guests, the beauty of the scenes, the magnificence of the buildings, and the opulence of the attending company, were all calculated to enhance the splendor of the occasion. The nuptial hymn was sung with the greatest enthusiasm, and the marriage feast was conducted with the greatest pleasure. The guests were entertained with the most sumptuous repast, and the evening was passed in the most agreeable company.

Mrs. William's, with her lovely eyes, her graceful figure, her happy smile, and her sweet voice, was the center of all attention. She was the most conversation of the evening, and her beauty was universally admired. Her deportment was graceful and becoming, and her manners were elegant and becoming.

The night was passed with the greatest hilarity, and the guests departed with the greatest satisfaction. The nuptial couple were the center of all attention, and their happiness was universally known. They were the envy of all who beheld them, and their happiness was the mirror of their love.
