THE POOR LITTLE BACHELOR'S TAX.

A poor bachelor born on one of the world's great cities. He had lived in the city for years, and was now an old man, living alone in a small room, with no one to care for him. His only possessions were a few books and some clothes.

The poor man's mind was broken and his heart was broken. He had loved a woman once, and she had been his only companion. Now she was gone, and he was alone. He had been a bachelor all his life, and he had never married. He had no children, and no one to care for him.

The poor man had no money, and he had no one to help him. He was alone, and he was poor. He had no one to care for him, and he was alone. He was a bachelor, and he was poor. He had no one to help him, and he was alone.

The poor man had no friends, and no one to help him. He was alone, and he was poor. He had no one to care for him, and he was alone. He was a bachelor, and he was poor. He had no one to help him, and he was alone.

The Opening of the Colleges.

On the 8th of September, a public celebration was held at the new University of Michigan. The opening of the college building, however splendid, reminded the thoughtful observer of the great contrast existing between the present and the past.

The present university is a magnificent structure, the finest in the United States, and is the result of great labor and expense. Its beauty is enhanced by the fact that it is situated in one of the most picturesque parts of the State. The grounds are well arranged and the buildings are well proportioned.

The university is well endowed and has a large number of students. It is said to be one of the best institutions of its kind in the country.

In conclusion, the author of this article expresses his hope that the university will continue to flourish and that it will become one of the greatest institutions of learning in the world.
