A TERRIBLE REVENGE.

It was the evening of the last day of December, when a group of men, under the leadership of Very Jones, attempted to rob a man named Very Jones. The plot was discovered, and a violent struggle ensued. In the course of the struggle, several of the robbers were killed, and one of them, named Very Jones, was captured. The article goes on to describe the subsequent events and the fate of the captured robber.

This is a historical document that provides insight into the events and culture of the time. It highlights the challenges faced by law enforcement and the dangers that were part of daily life in the 19th century.

JULY 17, 1866.

We perceive last week a communication of Mr. A.L.T., a correspondent of the New York World, to the editor of that paper, in which he advocates the establishment of sugar cane plantations in the southern states, as a means of increasing our domestic resources. In his letter, Mr. T. says, "The cane sugar manufacture in the South is a subject that requires careful consideration. The cultivation of the cane is a matter of great importance, and the establishment of sugar factories would be of great benefit to the country." He states that the cane sugar industry is already well developed in the South, and that the country is well equipped with the necessary machinery for the manufacture of sugar. He also states that the establishment of sugar factories would be of great benefit to the country, as it would provide employment for many of the people, and would also be profitable to the country.

OLD TOOLS.

Dowser's Tools.

Dowser’s tools are not much used any more, the dowsing rod or cross stick having almost entirely superseded them. The old tools were six feet long and were made with a handle in one end and a small thumb hole in the other. The latter end was rounded, and was inserted into a slackly hanging bag of dry leaves or feathers, which was tied on with a rope or thong. To operate the tool, the dowsing cross stick was held in the right hand, the thumb being thrust through the hole, and the bag or weight of dry leaves and feathers was allowed to hang down. The dowsing cross was kept absolutely vertical, no movement being allowed in any direction. With the right hand, the operator held the rod, which was pointed downward, and, with the left hand, he lowered the bag. When a stream of water was near, the weight of the bag was broken, and the dowsing cross was driven into the ground. If the water was deep, the weight was broken but little, and the dowsing cross was not driven more than an inch or two into the ground; while if the water was shallow, the weight was broken to such a degree that the dowsing cross was driven several inches into the ground. When a stream of water was very near, the dowsing cross would be driven in as far as the weight of the bag would allow, and then it would be driven back again, and the process repeated. The dowsing cross was usually made of a piece of olive wood, and was formed by joining two sticks together at an angle of about forty-five degrees. The dowsing cross was then often used for some years, and was then replaced by the more efficient dowsing rod of today.

The dowsing rod consists of two rods, one of which is fixed to the other, and is used for indicating the direction of the water. The fixed rod is called the "guide," and the movable rod is called the "pointer." The guide is usually made of a piece of wood, and is about four feet long. The pointer is usually made of a piece of metal, and is about three feet long. The guide is held in the left hand, and the pointer is held in the right hand. The operator, standing between the guide and the pointer, looks at the pointer, and attempts to "see" the stream of water. If the water is near, the pointer will be drawn to the location of the water, and the operator will be able to "see" it. If the water is far away, the pointer will not be drawn to the location of the water, and the operator will not be able to "see" it. The dowsing rod is a more efficient tool than the dowsing cross, and is used in almost every case where water is to be found.

The Republican,

POLITICAL

May 24, 1861.

The great changes which the Democratic party of Greenville has recently undergone are very important in the best sense of the word. The party's general purpose is to hold to the old Republican principles of the Democratic party, and the following delegate list is a fair representation of that body. The new Republican organization of the State, sanctioned by the conventions, will be in full force at the present time, and the Republican party will take a prominent place in the election. The new organization has been formed by Mr. H. E. Haines, the former secretary of the party.

Unconditional Unionists.

One of the most pleasing features of the recent changes is the unconditional Unionism of the Democratic party. The new organization has been formed by Mr. H. E. Haines, the former secretary of the party, and the new officers of the party are well known Unionists. The new organization has been formed by Mr. H. E. Haines, the former secretary of the party.
