THE DESTRUCTION OF THE BARRICADE.
The fall of New Orleans itself has not given a more painful shock to the public mind than the melancholy fact that the Confederate Government has found nothing better to do with the Mer Rouge—that great gift of God and of Virginia to the South—than to take her out into the river and blow her timbers to atoms with thirty-six thousand pounds of that powder which we need so much and prepared with such infinite anxiety. This event will ring through Europe—that we blew up, with our own hands, our noble vessel, of which we were unworthy, because incompetent to make any use of her. It is a confession of impotence, mismanagement and wretchedness too painful for consideration.
